Centurion Welcomes New Year With a Blaze

Wednesday, Feb. 8, 2012 started out like any other Wednesday at Centurion Products Inc. The weather in Nashville, TN was mild for the middle of winter.

At approximately 2:30 p.m., a fire was reported in the mold fabrication area. After an attempt to extinguish, it became apparent the firefighters needed to be called. Nashville Metropolitan Firefighters showed up in force to what was classified as a 3 Alarm Fire. After approximately an hour and half of fighting the fire, they were successful in keeping it from spreading to the adjacent Corporate Offices.

President Tim Pardue commented, “They did a great job of keeping the fire from the offices, where the computer systems are housed. Which are a valuable asset to this company.”

The Mold Fabrication Room was a total loss. Plans were immediately put into action to remove the burnt debris and start on the rebuilding process.

It was just about two years ago when Centurion was hit by the historical May floods in Nashville. Operations were only halted for two days, but the Corporate Offices had to be completely redone due to water damage.

With this event, there were no delays in the manufacturing of our product. More importantly, nobody was injured. Once again, Centurion will rebuild and be fully back better than ever.

With today’s architectural trend toward smooth, flat faced stones, Centurion’s slate face patterns have become one of the most popular choices of interior and exterior design in commercial and residential applications.

The Relationship between Stone Shapes and Patterns

Normally square and rectangular shapes are most common in stone. Hence, different stone shapes tend to create different stone patterns. Furthermore, the installation of custom slate pieces blended into patterns, such as Centurion’s Biltmore, Castlerock & Running Bond, have contributed to the popularity of these patterns in both interior and exterior applications. The ability to incorporate these strong and durable stone pieces into various patterns explain why the design is rapidly increasing.
